Course Description

This course provides a comprehensive analytical overview of development theories, its evolution and associated strategies over the period since first Industrial Revolution. It treats development as ‘struggle’ – “a struggle over the shapes of futures, a dramatic and a complex struggle” while also recognizes that development is a holistic and multidisciplinary study of social change. This course focuses on the emergence, evolution, demise and deconstruction of development theories in conjunction with characterizations of socioeconomic and political realities and social imaginations from which they originate. Emphasis is given on tracing the issues and themes from traditions of the classical political economy, Malthusian, neo-classical and utilitarian, Keynesian, welfare, neo-institutional economic, Marxian, dependency, structural, social development, gender, human development, post-development and global development perspectives. Course Description

Most managers say that managing people is the most dynamic, challenging, and frustrating and rewarding activity they face. The studies of organizations and of people who work in them both constitute the field of organizational behavior. Technical skills are necessary but insufficient for succeeding in management. In today's increasing competitive & demanding workplace managers cannot succeed on their technical skills alone. Since managers get things done through other people, they also have to have sound people skills to work with. Understand & motivate people, both individually & in groups. This course will help both managers & future managers to develop these people skills.

Course Description

Anthropology is the study of all people, in all places and at all times. We are drawn to anthropology as part of the realization that our lives and experiences are limited but human possibilities virtually endless. We are drawn by the almost incredible variability of human society and our desire to experience and understand it. We are drawn by the beauty of other lives, but sometimes by the horror as well. Anthropology is not only broad in its scope, but when anthropologists do their work, they do it deeply as well: most research requires a commitment of years or even decades of detailed and intensive study. From such research, generations of anthropologists have discovered a vast amount of information about humanity. Paleoanthropologists are uncovering fossils and unwinding genetic relationships that are filling in the blanks in how and when our species originated. Archaeologists are digging into information about how prehistoric peoples lived their lives.
